A man, commencing on the approaching marriage of a pretty girl from a humble family, said that a working girl was the most expensive wife a man in easy circumstances could take, because her ideas grew with the chances for fulfilling them. A girl who had known plenty was not seeking new ways in which to spend money. The basis of this opinion was the changed attitude of the bride-to-be. She had formerly looked upon a convenient little flat as the acme of comfort and elegance, then she agreed to marry a and elegance—then she agreed to marry a man with a handsome home to give her, and other luxuries like motor cars. Immediately her ideas expanded, and she is now contemplating changes and new fur-nishings that will seriously tax his means, All this was discussed in a public car with names and addresses. What a pity the object of the remarks could not hav heard them. BETTY BRADEEN.
